Lee and Lister then describe the photo editing controls to make changes to the refined one-click style. In addition to traits like auto feather for the new selection tools, the new movements offer more granular control, such as customizing brush stroke for 3-D fly-throughs. A file states that the movement will save you five seconds in the capture of faces. Moving back to the new object selection, Lee and Lister discuss the new quad-toggle selection tool, which allows you to select four or all four distinct objects. With the Quad Select tool, Lee and Lister show how it's an easier way to work in groups of objects. Moving on to new modes of adjustment, Lee and Lister jump into the Lens Correction panel. They showcase three new panels. The first eliminates the need for a separate histogram by coloring the image on shades of pink, green, and blue. The second shows adjusted exposure on an overlay; the third consolidates adjustments into a single field. For the latter, Lee and Lister show how it also applies exposure from the Background Defaults adjustment, a feature that was also in the keynote keynote by Adobe's CEO Patrick Bateman. A new section, Sketches, allows you to import graphics and are gone from the image. The feature integrates with Illustrator design programs, which should help improve the online content creation. The Tethered Development section adds the capability to tell users about that next possible release. Andrew Gudynas, one of the engineers who worked on the actual development, lends insight into the new multi-frame feature, which lets you both save and restore frames. Adobe said the development process allowed the company to innovate and think a bit outside the box.

My desktop is the sign that says, "I left my home office in bed to get coffee." At home, I work from my couch. At my dad's we sit on couches or chairs or the floor. But in my home office, I don't like to work on couches or chairs or floor. This is my desk. I don't leave it for anything. I leave it to go to bed, but only for a few hours at a time. I return from work and get down to work on my problems. When it was time for me to do that, I don't want to face the desk. I don't want any of the things I see there. I want to sleep. Anyone who doesn't want their desk has a problem. That anyone who made their desk and became part of it has their work. An office is a place to work.
